Current Research, Writing, and Service

I am increasingly drawn to change over time. As indicated in its title, the recently published Urban Neighborhoods in a New Era is built around a contrast between neighborhood policy and politics in the present postindustrial time and experience in a previous period, propelled by the policy and politics of physically redeveloping the city. My current venture along this line traces a succession of research paradigms, their insights, and limitations.

Following a path identified in Urban Neighborhoods in a New Era, I am also working with Robert Stoker on ways of highlighting the local as a vital, but not free standing, arena of research. Rather, we see the local as shaped in an interaction between itself and a wider trans-local context. In a paper titled "Urban Politics Revisited," we make a case for a bilevel approach.

Member of editorial Board of Urban Affairs Review
